We have examined the role of N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) glutamate receptors in regulating the survival of rat trigeminal ganglion cells in culture. The major axonal pathway through which N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) is thought to act is the dorsal spino-medullary pathway. Activation of the NMDA receptor-channel complex leads to an increase in calcium conductance which in turn leads to an increase in transmitter release from the cell soma. We therefore investigated whether the number of cells immunoreactive for the NMDA receptor was modulated by the presence of the axon. Our results show that NMDA receptor-immunoreactivity is expressed by the cells of the ganglion core in a topographical arrangement that was reversed in the presence of axons. This could be attributed to the axon-induced loss of substrate-adhesive material which may underlie the normal response in the non-neural environment of the ganglion.# Copyright (c) 2013, Frappe Technologies Pvt.
