The pursuit of constant capital by J.B. Clark (v.1.2) Silly, until you look at it in the context of real world capitalism. Why would any capitalist want to pay himself absurdly high wages, at the risk of going out of business? A capitalist would more likely invest his money in order to get a return, such as from a factory, or a piece of land, and get his money back again in the form of even higher wages, so he can afford to employ more workers and expand the business. Similarly, why would a capitalist choose to produce at high prices if the only customers for his product are government agencies, at the risk of going out of business? Again, a capitalist would more likely invest his money in factories, equipment, or a piece of land, all of which will make him money back over time and allow him to invest even more money, and keep making money until he dies. The question of the article is in what the author means by “human capital”, which is always based on the labour of the workers. If we consider the example of a capitalist company, the entrepreneur is the “human capital”, which will get higher if it pays higher wages to its workers. But why not just eliminate the human capital, and pay the workers less? This doesn't eliminate capitalism, it merely leads to the “success of the worker” being a necessary condition for the “success of the company”. The thing that eliminates the need for the “human capital” is competition, in the form of a market based on profit. Simply paying workers more won't increase their productivity; the only thing it will accomplish is to allow them to consume more, even at higher costs. On a parallel plane, the issue of “human capital” is a question of the productivity of the entrepreneur, which will be higher the more he tries to increase productivity, which in turn will only be possible if he doesn't go out of business. So, long after the fact, when nobody is buying any more, the entrepreneur will pay himself more because he is going to the market with high productivity as a known and available factor, and will get less for his product. It may seem like a victory for the capitalist, but it is a pyrrhic one, in that it is totally dependent on the stability of the production cycle, which is not a static and unch
