The Krita team is happy to announce the latest stable release of the Krita application for Linux. This release contains major updates to the features and fixes reported by our users. See what's new "Krita is released as open source and all the community members provide patches, translations and commit their code back to the main project. One main thing we've tried to do for this release is to enable more contributors to join the project by making it easier for them to contribute." says Beáta Szabó Kaján, Krita project maintainer. See a list of new features and release notes here. 1. Krita now runs on Wayland It was the first major milestone. Krita now runs on Wayland by default, and can be used with any traditional display manager (such as the popular light-DM), or even without a display manager by using KWin by default. Krita has been built with Wayland support from day one, ever since its first stable release. The KWin team did a lot of work to make Wayland work smoothly with Krita: the window decorations, the use of desktop-extended blitting features and multithreading support. You can try Krita on Wayland by running `krita --with-x11=false`. If you have some problems with the Wayland window manager, the KWin team is also very active on the Wayland mailing list. Note, however, that Krita is still not fully supported on Wayland yet. There are some glitches and bugs you may encounter (e.g. the plugin dock is unavailable until you close a plugin window). The user interface may also lack some of the features Krita now supports by default. Among others, Krita now supports the new global menu system on Wayland, which is not yet implemented for the user interface yet. In other words, Krita now supports Wayland by default, but it is not fully functional yet. If you encounter some problems with the window manager, you can also try to run Krita with the `--with-x11=true` option. 2. New project management panel "We put a lot of focus on the design and usability of the Krita website, and our next goal was to improve the way that artists report bugs and submit issues in 05a79cecff

Analyst: A new way to make the mainstream market more aware of wearable technology It's not just the future of wearable technology on your wrist, but where it's taking us. It's the future of virtual reality that's going to have a huge impact on how we communicate and learn. But has this become a part of the mainstream market to the level that it warrants Silicon Valley entrepreneurs to make their pitch? According to [a] new [a] report by industry analysts, the answer may be yes. "Freedom" is a Western value, but that doesn't mean we have to put up with any idea or leader that threatens it. Can Democrats be for freedom and oppose Putin and Trump? Yes. What is the Left for? To begin with, let's understand the wider terms of the debate. As a political intellectual, I am an ardent Democrat. But I care deeply about protecting our freedoms, which the Trump administration and Putin government are doing their best to destroy. If someone criticizes an idea of mine, I am comfortable calling them a "racist" or a "Nazi" or a "Fascist," even if, as Richard Spencer, I don't hold those views. But I do have a problem calling people "Nazis," even when they are the same people who are convinced that racial differences in intelligence exist and that women are not intellectually capable of doing some of the jobs that historically have been reserved for men. Even in comparison with other types of racists, who go out of their way to insult and demean people on the basis of race, the Trump administration and the Russia government's admiration for Putin and leaders of "Eurasia" can be shocking. I am not, in the end, that worried about him being a "Nazi" because I understand — and, I hope, you do, too — that, when even Hitler considered supporting the Jews, he wasn't proud of his admiration for them, and he worried in ways that we don't understand about the stability of his regime. And I don't think that the Trump administration is a "Nazi" regime any more than I think its idea of "freedom" is rooted in any ideology other than white nationalism. What is the Left for? The Left is there to protect our freedoms. I understand that not all freedom-loving people are leftists, that not all leftists are free-thinking, that

Q: Getting Validator to not process already validated records during form submit I have a form with a number of validators applied to each field. I need to be able to validate the form, and update the database, but skip any records that have already been validated. For example: User enters name, validates length, not null. User enters name, validates length, not null. User enters name, validates length, not null, NOT VALIDATEING. User enters name, validates length, not null, NOT VALIDATING. If this were all that were being done, the validation would be skipped. I want to be able to perform the second two, while giving the user the option to pass their form with the third record not validated. I can't use a validation summary because there are a number of validators that are actually embedded within other validators. I am able to get all of the validation to work, but if I do so, the validation for all records on the form is triggered. It seems like what I need is to have the validation skip if the record with the same key has already been validated. Is there anyway to accomplish this using the built in validators? Any other ideas for how to approach this? Any assistance would be greatly appreciated! A: There's no built in capability to do this; the validation cannot be "conditional". You could just add a method to your model that returns a boolean: public function validated() { $alreadyValidated = true; foreach ($this->data as $field => $value) { $alreadyValidated = $alreadyValidated && $value!=" "; if ($field === 'fieldToValidate') { continue; } } return $alreadyValidated; } Then in your action, test for the method being called: validated() ) // Only do additional validations
