AutoCAD uses its own APIs to perform a broad array of tasks and functions, from developing Windows programs, to drawing windows, menus and toolbars, to opening and saving drawings, to converting from one to the other. Some of these APIs were released in earlier versions, while others have been developed for more recent versions. The "AutoCAD 2007" and "AutoCAD LT 2007" product line consists of the software application, including utilities and scripts. The desktop application is designed to be used as a drawing editor, while the LT version is for use in the business environment. It is designed to be a low-cost alternative to Visio. The LT version does not support VectorWorks (now part of Autodesk) and has no AutoCAD integration features. NetTalk, the application-level network protocol used by AutoCAD, contains a large number of API functions.
