And using the HP ScanJet 3500C USB Driver, you are limited to a maximum resolution of 1200 x 800. I have the same issue on my Mac. I'd like to try to scan at 72 DPI but the menu has no option for that. I was wondering if there were any "third-party" software available to change the raw input to the scanner, so that at least some of the resolution would have been available. A: I'm no expert at all, but it's not obvious to me that the 3D Scanner cannot have 1200dpi with a scanner driver from HP. I'm not sure, but I think this might be the case: Here's an article about the difference between ScanJet and Pixma. It's quite long, but contains the information you asked for. A: If you are willing to pay $250, it is possible to purchase a USB storage box and a USB 2.0 or USB 3.0 to USB 2.0 or USB 3.0 converter. The Box will likely have a paper type document feeder, a feeder tray, the scanner-driver, and it will support duplex scanning. If you scan both sides of the sheet, you get a PDF. The Box will be the front end scanner and a real scanner is the back end. A $250 investment has upsides -- and downsides. The downside is that if you want to use Epson scanners, you are out of luck. The downside is that you are limited in the DPI of the image that you can obtain. The upside is that you get the bonus of a calibrated image. You get a color match. You can calibrate the image. The application on the computer's screen is not acceptable in many cases. The color gamut of the image is not what you expect, like the monitor on your Mac or PC. The upside is that the document gets scanned twice. With USB 2.0 or 3.0, it takes about 30 seconds to obtain an image. That may be acceptable.
