A wheel hub unit is generally used for axially mounting a wheel to a vehicle. The wheel hub unit has at least one axle flange, which is axially attached to the wheel in the axial direction and which is intended to be attached to a spindle of a driving-wheel carrier of a wheel axle. A wheel flange, which is axially attached to a vehicle-body-side suspension component of the wheel hub unit, is intended to be attached to the vehicle-body-side suspension component in a way such that the wheel flange is fixedly connected to the vehicle-body-side suspension component. In the wheel hub unit known from EP 1 149 332 A1, the wheel flange is connected via a flange-connecting element to the vehicle-body-side suspension component, in which case the flange-connecting element, which is fixedly connected to the vehicle-body-side suspension component and serves as the flange carrier, is mounted on the vehicle-body-side suspension component in an axially movable manner. The wheel flange is positioned in the axial direction with respect to the vehicle-body-side suspension component in order to ensure a clear design of the wheel hub unit. In the known wheel hub unit, as a result of the axially movable mounting, which can be implemented using a number of different methods, of the flange-connecting element on the vehicle-body-side suspension component, one and therefore a number of axially protruding elements are formed, as a result of which a wheel hub unit is designed to meet its respective customer's criteria. This approach is, however, associated with a series of disadvantages. On the one hand, the production of such a wheel hub unit is expensive, as not only a flange-connecting element and vehicle-body-side suspension component must be manufactured but also the flange-connecting element must be mounted on the vehicle-body-side suspension component. On the other hand, such a wheel hub unit comprises a number of components.Armin van Buuren Releases New Album 'Am
