Today we are going to talk about how LORAN really worked and more specifically about LORAN 4 and how it works now. We are going to look at. PANTOGRAPH

What did LORAN really do? LORAN was an early attempt at using a global positioning system (GPS) for navigation. It's purpose was to create a nautical positioning system based on the mathematical principles used by electronics to tell you the distance between where you are and where you want to go. This system, or network, was designed to generate r. LORAN (Long Range Navigation) was created by the U.S. Navy for military ship and aircraft guidance and control. LORAN radio signals were emitted by a series of ground stations, not unlike the network you use for TV or internet signals. The LORAN technology was invented in the 1930s, but it was never completely successful until the invention of the global positioning system, which in turn spawned technology which led to the smart phone revolution of today. LORAN was abandoned after WW2, primarily due to the proven military value of satellites. Sure, ships could use LORAN, but couldn't use an invisible orbiting object to navigate? And besides, by the 1960s we had larger and more reliable satellites that could be used instead of ground-based systems. Satellites, although precise, are weak. They can only be used for navigation of a small number of military crafts and aircraft. General purpose ships, like those which supply your TV or internet service, are too small to have an LORAN receiver. On the other hand, ground-based radio
