I have checked online and it seems that most of the tutorials and questions that ask this don't provide any reason why. So, why should I disable APC? If I don't use it, will my server slow down? A: Because you don't want to use it. APC is a lot of stuff that can cause errors if you don't fully use. If you use APC for static caching but you do not use APC to cache your session state that means you will have a session issue on subsequent requests. APC can not support a lot of things you want to do. It has functions like process_id(), apc_cache_info(), apc_bootstrap() but a lot of other features are missing. If you need to support multiple versions of PHP, you will have to handle cache setting in each version. If you want to use a dependency injection container for your classes, you will have to use APC and thus lose a lot of features and have no way to configure those features. If you have some kind of sandboxing in your application that requires the program to know about `PHP_SELF`, you will have to hardcode that to the location of `APC_SESSION_START`. Neonatal hypothyroxinemia and impaired responses to naloxone in adult male and female rats. ca3bfb1094
