Calcium pyrophosphate crystal arthritis is a common disorder of the elderly and a significant cause of musculoskeletal pain and disability. The most common arthritic manifestation of calcium pyrophosphate deposition disease is chondrocalcinosis, and calcium pyrophosphate crystal deposition disease of the spine is increasingly recognised. Calcium pyrophosphate deposition disease is not an active inflammatory disorder, but progresses toward irreversible joint damage and arthritic change in a relatively short time. The chondrocalcinotic process may be stimulated by joint trauma or overuse. Nonsteroidal antiinflammatory drugs are of little value and long-term use is associated with a significant risk of gastrointestinal bleeding. Low-dose aspirin or colchicine may decrease the frequency of attacks or reduce the intensity of pain. Therapeutic agents that inhibit cartilage destruction have been developed, but the available drugs are effective in only a limited number of cases. Therefore, prevention remains the best means of reducing the progression and disability associated with calcium pyrophosphate crystal arthritis.MIPs MIPs is an annual multidisciplinary conference held every April at the University of Oxford.
