There is a whole new interface layout in Lightroom 5. The idea of the new workspace, in my opinion, is to provide a new way for your pictures to be organised (and for your editing to be organised). In the old days (version 4 and below), the 4 modules on the left would list: All, Invert, Clarity, Presets and, finally, Crop. On version 5, the same modules are generic. In the new workspace, you get a new areas of interest placed in one of the following areas: Library, My Photos, File Management, Catalog, Edit. These areas are populated by generic modules for Facial recognition and keywords, which are sometimes useful if you are working with a lot of pictures. Note that on the left side, in the bottom corner, you have all the modules from previous Lightroom versions in an easy way However, the downside is that the interface is not as clear as it was before so it is a bit harder to navigate and use without any doubt. The buttons that were always black on a dark background have now been changed to grey on a light background. The new workspace that is used to organise your editing is a new concept. This one is very good, as in some condition, files may be difficult to find due to the complex toolbars and well hidden panels. The biggest disappointment of this update is that there is still no way that I can find to edit RAW files that are imported from my camera directly into Lightroom. Until now, I had to open it in Adobe Camera Raw and made the adjustments in there which means that it's not really independent from the application. However, Camera Raw has been integrated directly into the Lightroom and you can now use it easily for needed adjustment instead of manually doing it in the Lights or Camera.

"We are constantly exploring new ways to simplify and accelerate image creation, enhance our customers' productivity, and delight our users with powerful new features that offer a new level of collaboration and creativity. Another one of the latest rumors is that Apple has begun deploying the new AirPods models with new hardware, with some even suggesting that these new AirPods are actually the AirPods 2 we've spoken about before. The update has been around already for a while, but it seems that Apple is beginning to deploy them to the masses. First, the Forbes article details new hardware and other details about the AirPods 2. For example, the article suggests that the new AirPods will allow users to better "flow" into and out of conversations, and will also offer six hours of talk time even when the battery has less than 50 percent charge. "Last year's version of AirPods was designed to shepherd [streaming] music-only users away from wired Apple EarPods; presumably in anticipation that Apple branded EarPods would soon get an AirPower charging pack and become the default set Apple recommends using in order to preserve battery life," Microsoft's Paul Thurrott writes. "This year seems to be all about Apple leaving wired EarPods behind. According to one Apple insider, the company is nearing a firm delivery schedule for its data-sucking AirPods option, and is planning to tighten up Bluetooth connections between devices."
