The purpose of this study was to explore the perceptions of perinatal nurses and obstetricians of each group's abilities to provide labor support to a nurse midwife. Obligatory hospitalization of parturients prevents the professional nurse from being present at the birth, and the absence of the professional nurse during the birth is likely to be associated with increased stress for the parturient. Data were collected by means of a two-part questionnaire that was mailed to two groups of nurses in three states. Both questionnaires were identical except for a single item. The first part of the questionnaire asked the questions about the nurses' knowledge and experience in obstetric management. The second part asked the questions about labor support for the nurse midwife. Overall, 96% of the obstetricians and 82% of the perinatal nurses responding to the survey felt confident that they could provide labor support to the nurse midwife. Both groups agreed 79a2804d6b
