Creating the ultimate desktop publishing application was one of the most difficult launching efforts for any new software. The reason for this is two fold and firstly, the appetite for applications that were still being created was low and secondly, with the formation of Adobe Systems in 1982, there was a clash of cultures between the Macintosh Creative Suite and the Microsoft Office created by Microsoft. Regardless of the growing popularity of personal computing, the timing never quite aligned and Photoshop would arrive about 15 years too late in the market.
